5. Why does the author argue that scientific advances in reproductive biology require government regulation?
Government regulation is necessary to help society evaluate the ethical implications and possible consequences of emerging reproductive technologies.

6. Why might heritable gene editing raise greater ethical concerns than other genetic technologies?
Heritable gene editing raises ethical concerns because genetic changes introduced into embryos can be passed on to future generations.

11. What visual ability did the patient regain, and what device helped produce the result?
The patient distinguished some high-contrast objects using light-sensing goggles.

12. Why should the clinical result be described as partial rather than a complete restoration of vision?
The improvement was limited, and it did not restore normal vision.
